Latest from Bodie.

BODIE, July 11.—The dead now number six as far as heard from, as follows: Frank Tyle, blacksmith; Thos. Flavin, miner; William O'Brien, miner; Chas. Malloy, miner; Hugh McMillan, engineer; and John McCarthy. There are others dangerously hurt who may die at any moment. The number of wounded will not fall far short of forty, which, in addition to the names telegraphed last evening, will be all collected during the day. There will be no cessation of work on the Standard mine. The new shaft is perfectly competent to do all the hoisting required. John F. Boyd has been active in his exertions to relieve the distressed, as have all the Standard people. A cabin near the works, owned by J. Collins, was completely demolished, burying in its ruins eight people, who escaped miraculously, with slight scratches. John McMillan was in his cabin, which was knocked down over his head, and he crawled out unaided. The house occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Cluff was shaken up and some of the occupants injured. A man named Sullivan had both eyes put out and his skull fractured. One Chinaman, who occupied a cabin, was buried beneath the ruins, and as we write, has not been found. While engaged in loading the buckets for the team, a man was struck in the foot with a rock, and thrown many foot distant. A dispatch received at 10:30 from Bridgeport, twenty miles distant, says the shock of the explosion was distinctly felt there, and people imagined it to be an earthquake.

BODIE'S CALAMITY.

An Explosion of a Powder Magazine—
Destruction of the Standard and
Summit Works—Many Killed and Wounded.

A frightful disaster occurred at Bodie last evening. The giant powder magazine near the old Standard mine incline exploded with a shock like an earthquake. The works of the Standard were blown to pieces and all the buildings near demolished. The Summit works went down in the general ruin. The shaft of the Standard mine took fire immediately after the explosion. A large force of men were in the mine, but as the drifts had been connected they were not in danger. The shock was scarcely felt under ground. The catastrophe sent Bodie wild with excitement. The loss of life was at first supposed to be great, and for sometime it was impossible to learn the truth. The relatives of the men in the mine were in an agony of fright until they learned of the safety of the miners. The last dispatch from Bodie stated that as far as heard from, there were eight deaths and over forty wounded. In addition to the bodies recovered, others are believed to have been blown to pieces beyond recognition. Bodie has the sympathy of our citizens in her distress.
