

FIND SIX BODIES OF MINE VICTIMS

Fourteen Other Men Fleen to Safety When Gas Explosion
Rocks Virginia Mine.

Parrott, Va., Jan. 19 (UP)—Bodies of six men killed in an explosion deep in the Pulaski anthracite mine were recovered early today by a rescue squad which had battled for hours against debris and gasses to reach their entombed comrades.

The dead:

Frank Seffered, Dewey Seffered, Harvey Seffered, none of them brothers, Ernest Snead and Foster and Artie Boyd, brothers. The positions of their bodies indicated all had died instantly.

Cause of the blast, which roared through the main shaft only a few minutes after the 20 men of the night shift had entered the mine probably never will be known, a mine official told the United Press today.

The remaining 14 men of the late shift managed to reach the surface safely, though several were so dazed and stupefied by the mad rush over the debris and through the deadly gases in the shaft that they stumbled and fell as they reached the outside.
