

Victim of Mine Explosion Found

LOUISVILLE, Colo., Jan. 23. (AP)—The body of Fireboss Steve Davis was recovered from the explosion-torn Monarch Coal mine today with evidence he met a terrorizing, slow death from suffocation.

His body was the seventh removed from the mine since a gas blast demolished sections of its labyrinth of tunnels last Monday. The body of the eighth victim, Joe Jaramillo, barn boss, was believed buried under tons of debris.

Rescue crews who searched the mine steadily for 60 hours with a faint hope that Davis might be found alive came upon his body one and one-half miles from the main shaft, and one-half mile from an airshaft through which two miners escaped.

There were footprints in the dust of the shaft where Davis had struggled frantically to reach the air shaft.

"The tracks showed he walked upright for a short distance, then they faltered," members of the rescue party said.
